Not illustrated. 1873 Excerpt: ... position of islands in rivers is determined by measuring, on or near the bank, a base line, connected with the surveyed lines, and taking the proper bearings to a flag or other object on the island, and computing the distance from the meander corners of the river to points on the bank of the island. The island can be meandered from such points. In meandering lakes, ponds, or bayous, commence at a meander corner of the township line, and proceed as in case of a river. If, however, the body of water is entirely within a township, begin at a meander corner established in subdividing. In meandering a pond lying entirely within the boundaries of a section, run to the pond two lines from the nearest section or quarter section corners, on opposite sides of the pond, giving their bearings and distances, and at the intersection of these lines with the bank of the pond establish witness points by planting posts, witnessed by bearing trees or mounds and pits, then commence to meander at one of these points, and proceed around to the other, and thence to the point of beginning. No blazes or marks are made on meander lines between established corners. 261. Swamp Lands. By the act of Congress approved Sept. 28th, 1850, swamp and overflowed lands, unfit for cultivation, are granted to the state in which they are situated. If the larger part of the smallest legal subdivision is swamp, it goes to the state; if not, it is retained by the Government. In order to determine what lands fall to the state under the swamp act, it is required that the field notes, beside other things required to be noted, should indicate the points where the public lines enter and leave all such land. The aforesaid grant does not embrace lands subject to casual inundation, but those only where the ...
