

This book is the fruit of two months spent in the autumn of 1920 in Soviet Russia. A visit to Russia is no longer a difficult adventure. I obtained a British passport to Estonia and a Russian permit quite easily. Travelling was uneventful, and less uncomfortable than I had found it in Poland, Austria and Germany the year before. I met invariably with kindness and courtesy, and made many acquaintances, who represented every phase of opinion. White exiles in London had told me that I should be watched, followed and personally conducted wherever I went, and that no opponent of the Communists would dare to talk with me or approach me. None of these predictions came true. I went about alone whenever and wherever I wished. I saw the leaders of the opposition alone in Moscow. In the provinces the local leaders of the opposition sought me out. Even in trains and libraries, strangers would enter into conversation and express themselves quite freely. Let me say at once that while I heard much criticism in Russia, I never heard there the wild exaggerations in which exiles indulge abroad. So far from receiving too much help from official quarters in my inquiries, I could sometimes have wished for more. There is much kindness but very little method in the dealings of the Bolsheviks with foreign journalists. (Typographical errors above are due to OCR software and do not occur in the book.)
